

On Lawsuits and Karma

Many of us have heard of the term karma. It is often used in the context of the Eastern religions of Hinduism or Buddhism. Karma can mean many things, depending on the context in which it is used. When people use the expression “it is karma,” what they are saying is that “it is destiny,” that the results were preordained. In the Eastern traditions, karma suggests that one’s actions in one stage of existence predetermines what happens the next stage. Karma is about cause and effect, or choices and consequences. Karma can be applied to the choices you make in everyday life. The actions that you take today can affect your life in the future. For example, if you had decided to become a doctor, in college you would have taken all the necessary pre-med classes to qualify for medical school. Your actions in college determined whether you can become a doctor. Karma suggest that there is a direct relationship between your choices and the consequences of your choices. As a result, many Eastern traditions advocate a balanced approach to everything.

As the United States’ economy continues to falter, people become more desperate and try to hold or to grab onto things. This can be seen in the increase in lawsuits that have been filed across the country. In an effort to either hold onto what they have or to grab something that they want, people file lawsuits. Whether there is a legal reason for the filing of the lawsuit is not the real issue. The real question is whether the lawsuit was justified energetically. The practice of law and the justice system is based on the Universal Law of Balance. Everything is in perfect balance with everything else. When people use the law to take that which does not belong to them, they are going against the Universal Law and creating an imbalance within themselves. The universe will re-balance itself by taking the excess energy from that person in another form. The energy taken back can be in the form of health from the person and/or their families, personal or business setbacks, or some other losses.

Taking more than you are owed has nothing to do with whether you win or lose a lawsuit. It has to do with your intentions and the effects of your intentions on the other party. Karma return means that you owe for taking something and did not give an equal amount of energy. Filing a lawsuit to punish someone who does not have the financial strength to defend against it may result in you owing, even if you win and are counting the money. Pushing someone over the edge of sanity, violence, breakdown, heart attack, or bankruptcy are just some of the ways where the short term gains may be less than the amount you owe after the universe re-balances itself.

Is your life in balance? Is there a karma return in your life?
